Example of Writing an Essay on the Topic “Why Do You Want to Be a Nurse”

I. Introduction Sample of an Essay on the Topic “Why Do You Want to Be a Nurse”

Ever since I was a child, I have always been intrigued by the nursing profession. Basically, the fact that nurses were always busy attending to patients every time I happened to be in a clinical setting made me see them as the most important people in the world. For me, anybody who could alleviate pain and suffering was a hero. This background is the basis of my application for admission to a Bachelor’s of Nursing degree, specializing in mental health at Stanford School of Nursing.

II. Examples of Body Paragraphs in an Essay on the Topic “Why Do You Want to Be a Nurse”

A. Reasons

Nowadays, mental health is one of the most significant components of the health care system. In this case, several research studies have reported the challenges that the health care system faces in contemporary society. Basically, one of these challenges is a lack of specialist nurses to deal with emerging issues like increased cases of mental health disorders in communities (Merwin, Hinton, Dembling, & Stern, 2003). For any healthcare system to be functional and relevant, it must address health issues that face populations. Hence, I believe studying a nursing course will not only make me a key player in the delivery of mental health services but also address the problem of a lack of professionals in the sector.

B. Academic Experience

Over time, I have made significant academic steps, focusing on my childhood aspiration of becoming a nurse practitioner. As evidenced in the attached transcripts, I have performed well in my sciences, which I believe are critical in pursuing any career in the health care field.

Through volunteering and internships, I have also had opportunities to work with diverse health care teams in different settings. For example, I have interned at Médecins Sans Frontières (Doctors Without Borders), where I got first-hand experiences of dealing with endemic diseases. In turn, this experience confirmed my childhood perception that nurses are critical players in health care delivery, an aspect that makes them very important professionals in society.

C. Personal Characteristics

As a person, I have qualities that I believe are essential in nursing. Besides being patient, I pay particular attention to detail. Moreover, my friends and family members say I am a perfectionist, and it is because I have a low tolerance for mistakes. For example, while I may be patient with someone who has not mastered the art of doing something, I may not entertain reckless mistakes from them. Therefore, I believe that individuals show commitment by working to satisfy expectations that others have toward them, meaning that everybody must work hard to turn their personal weaknesses into strengths.

D. Goals

Indeed, attaining a Bachelor of Nursing degree in mental health is my immediate goal. However, I look forward to investing in education to develop vital capacity to influence policymaking in the health care system. Basically, my long-term goal is to hold a political office where I will use my health care training to advance issues beneficial to the nursing profession and industry. In such a position, I use networking to bring stakeholders together to address pertinent nursing issues, particularly the challenges facing mental health services at community levels.

III. Conclusion Sample of an Essay on the Topic “Why Do You Want to Be a Nurse”

My present application for admission to a Bachelor of Nursing degree program in mental health is my pathway to becoming a nurse practitioner. In this case, attaining this goal will satisfy a life-long dream of helping to alleviate pain and suffering created by medical conditions. By admitting me to a nursing program, you will be making a significant step in addressing the systemic shortage of mental health nursing professionals. More importantly, you will proactively ensure that mental health service delivery is sustainable despite obvious challenges.
